THOM BROWNE
NEW YORK

Thom Browne is widely recognized for redefining modern tailoring. Through his collections for men, women and children, Browne conveys a true American sensibility.

"The idea of uniformity to me is interesting because I think it does show true individuality, and I think that it shows true confidence."

In 2003, Browne began his business with the grey suits in a made-to-measure shop in New York City's West Village. With each jacket and trouser, he paired a grey cardigan, a white oxford shirt, a grey tie and silver tie-bar, and classic black brogues. The jacket was sharply tailored with a high-armhole cut. The trouser was hemmed at the ankle. This is the Thom Browne uniform.

The company has since expanded to include ready-to-wear, footwear, accessories, and a new fragrance. Browne is now known for his runway presentations and films, which have gained global attention for bringing viewers into his unique world. Each collection represents a new story of its own, taking traditional fabrics and reinterpreting them in a new way.

Now a global brand with over 50 stores, Thom Browne continues to challenge expectations with his approach to design, tailoring and presentation. His influence is evident through the culture-defining individuals who wear Thom Browne. The grey suit remains elemental to all he does, signifying a singular point-of-view and the commitment to exceptional quality in fabrics and tailoring.

RAIN CUBE

I adore Thom Browne's sense of uniformity, the sombreness of grey taken into a new light, and the ability he has to add individuality to uniform pieces.

My favourite things in life are hot showers, rainy days, and grey sweaters.

The Thom Browne box is a glass box that represents so much of my personality, projected onto a brand. I am quite simple everywhere except in my head, where I often feel that I am on a treadmill 24/7.

Thom Browne's approach to fashion is the complete opposite of traditional. He draws in geometric shapes, and thinks about the last step before the first step. I found myself identifying with the brand's sense of minimalism, finesse, and creativity that speaks without words. Much like the brand, I strive to create something that speaks for itself and requires no words.

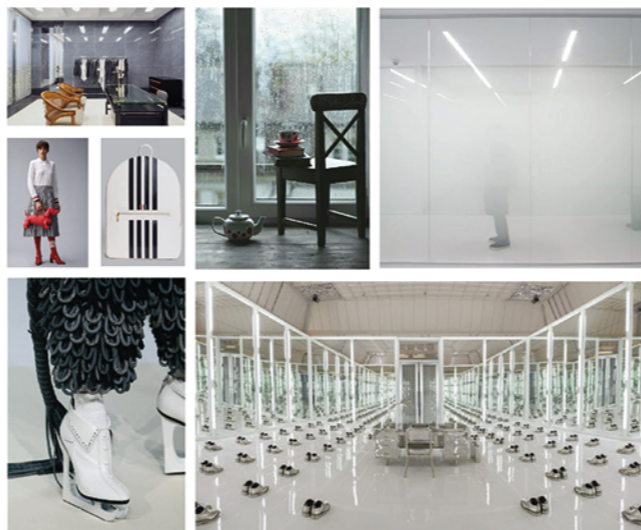

The Thom Browne Rain Cube is a glass box that simulates a rainy day, in which you can enter and don a Thom Browne raincoat. There are sizes for men, women, children, and pets, all uniform. Once you enter the monolith, the "rain cycle" begins, like a washing machine on a rainy day. The ambient sounds of the hydroponic system are amplified by artificial sound and minimal music, quite soothing and warm, despite being in a cold and bleak environment.

I think there is a quintessential British-ness that I brought to the brand, with the use of rain, minimalism, and quirk. Thom Browne's current visual branding focuses on brash, brutalist attitude, with grey uniforms thrown onto a society in which humans live to work, and I wanted to "humanise" the brand and make the appeal more about the emotions of those who would wear Thom Browne™.

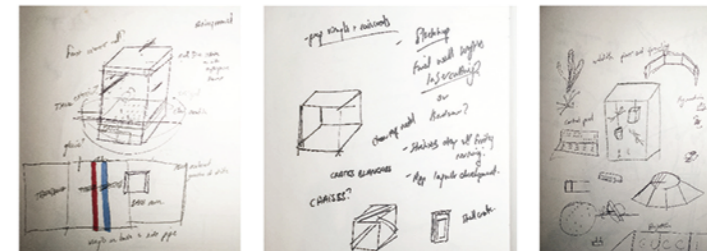

The box represents my homesickness in that it is vacant, empty, and clear. I aimed to make homesickness something everyone could relate to, and by making it a clear canvas, it almost looks like it's missing something.

That "something" it's missing, is people to occupy the empty space.

INSPIRATION

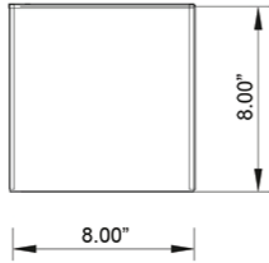

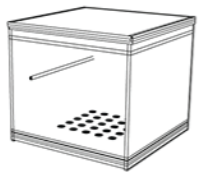

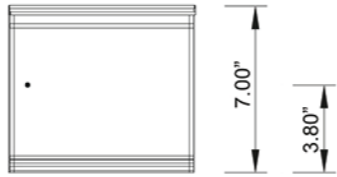

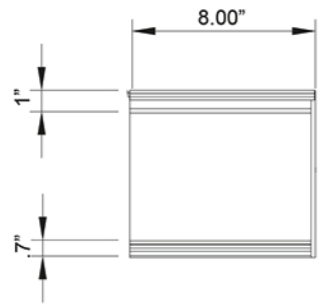

SKETCHES

The raincube is quite a simple structure, allowing itself to be placed virtually anywhere with a hydroponic system available. Ideally this would be presented at Rockefeller Centre during the summer months, or Grand Central Terminal during the autumn months. The structure also could be placed in Leicester Square, Avenue des Champs-Élysées, or Central Park. The floor is slightly tilted, to allow a "trough" to accumulate precipitation towards the left side (where the raincoats are). Customers would be able to purchase via location-based marketing; meaning that once you leave the cube, the Thom Browne website would be wirelessly sent to the users' phone.

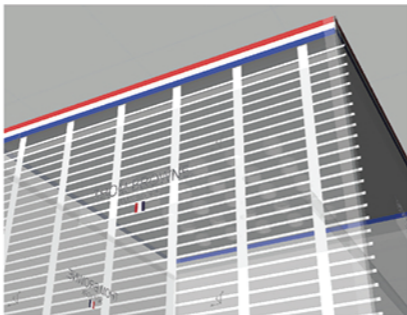

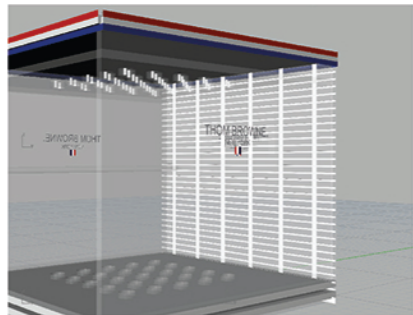

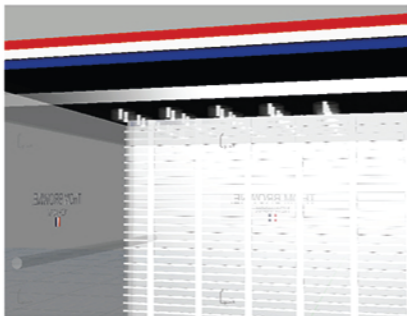

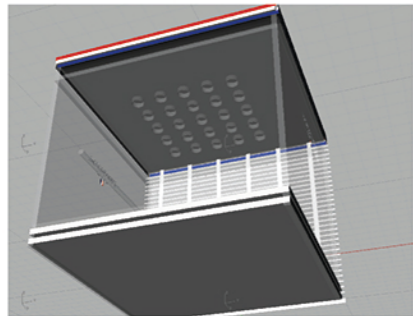

The raincoats were laser cut from plexiglass, in 4 sizes
